RE: Clinical Summary – Debra Nelson

To Whom It May Concern:

I am a licensed Clinical Social Worker practicing in the state of South Carolina. Debra Nelson became a client in my practice on or about 11/8/2022. She was seen on 11 occasions between that date and 12/13/2023. The counseling sessions were to address symptoms of anxiety, depression and emotional distress that she reported were related to circumstances occurring at her workplace.

During the course of treatment, Ms. Nelson consistently presented as oriented to person, place time and situation. Her thought processes were logical and coherent, and she did not present with hallucinations, delusions, or other symptoms of psychosis. Her physical appearance, speech, demeanor, and cognitive functioning were within normal limits. She denied suicidal or homicidal ideations. Her long-term and short-term memory appeared intact.

Initially, Ms. Nelson described hope that the workplace would be a respectful, safe, just and appreciative place to work. As time went on, she described her work as quality but began feeling unsupported when addressing workplace concerns. She became afraid that she would become the victim of this environment and not a respected employee with a contribution to be made. This caused her stress.

As she became more stressed, she reported symptoms of hopelessness, anxiety, difficulty sleeping, difficulty with important tasks and a hyper focus on how to feel safe enough to cope and perform at work. She began having some difficulty regulating her diabetes and was increasingly fearful regarding what the impact of perceived injustice would have on her overall wellbeing. She reported that she worked diligently within the workplace structure to resolve issues for herself. She took 2 weeks of sick leave to try to recover from her health and anxiety symptoms. She also sought counseling for help in processing her increasing stress symptoms. The goal of her counseling was to manage her anxiety and restore emotional stability and normal daily functioning and health.. She reported that she was fired a week after returning to work for contenting HR for a write up she stated was falsified

She continued therapy after her termination from Curtiss-Wright because of the continued stress that she has experienced during the ensuing lawsuit due to the nature of her interactions with the company and its representatives.

Her diagnosis was: F43.20. Adjustment Disorder. Unspecified

This letter is provided at Ms. Nelson's request to summarize the clinical observations and treatment context described above..

Sincerely,
